Q: Search whether is it possible to use regular expression in git diff command So far I used git diff command as mentioned below. git diff --no-index --diff-filter=ACMRTUXN file1 file2 The diff looks weird with the pattern. Can I use regex in this command and get much better output. A: git diff supports regular expressions, but git diff -w does not, it's more useful to read man git-diff, git diff -w --no-index --diff-filter=ACMRTUXN file1 file2 where you can add -w to disable the whitespace-sensitive diff It seems like you're wanting to use ACMRTUXN as an annotated regex, in which case you can use git diff --no-index --diff-filter=ACMRTUXN with a regex file. This allows both text matching (assuming your commit is small enough and you don't have a lot of commits) and searching for differences. You would probably want to stick to that as a pattern, instead of doing it like that, though. If you have a lot of commits to deal with, it's probably better to use grep. If you have a small number, it's probably better to let git diff find your changes. The main reason for this is, as you should expect by now, you lose some coverage and linearity. By using git diff -w instead of git diff, you can potentially win back those lost commits, or potentially loose a commit or two to the status quo. Beware that you can lose commits and break your history with that, so if you're dealing with thousands of commits to diff, you can lose a lot. Detection of differential gene expression in prostate cancer cells by real-time PCR of partial coding sequences. Expression analysis of partial cDNA sequences may provide insight into the expression levels of novel genes which are not represented on microarrays. A method was developed to perform real-time PCR based on the amplification of short cDNA sequences derived from the mRNA of candidate genes. Identification of a suitable set of transcripts was achieved by sequencing of PCR products that did not exceed 400 nucleotides in length. Primers for the amplification of short coding sequences were designed within the amplicon sequences which were partially overlapped to increase the specificity of the reaction. Biography Born: December 22, 1907 Died: December 4, 2011 (aged 102 years, 9 months, 6 days) Tunis, Jura, 1920 After the collapse of the Ottoman Empire in World War I, Tunisia became a French protectorate, and remained so for the next 55 years. In 1956, it was granted independence and has remained stable economically and politically ever since. José A. Menendez, in an article published in the Social Security Bulletin, "Bibliography, Research on Aging: The Case of the Spanish-Speaking Puerto Rican. A Genogram," examines the life and work of José A. Menéndez, an American sociologist of aging and gerontology (ancient and medieval societies, family, etc.) who served as Assistant Director of the Bureau of Gerontology at the Social Security Administration and Professor of Sociology and Anthropology at the University of Puerto Rico. It's the end of a remarkable career for a man who taught at Harvard and at the University of Puerto Rico for almost 60 years. José Menéndez is the author of the most influential article on aging, which appeared in the Social Security Bulletin in 1972, titled "Aging of the Male Population in Puerto Rico." The article won the 1975 Ann W. Stinchfield Award, which is given to the single article in the Social Security Bulletin that is most meritorious and likely to make an important contribution to the social security movement. The article laid the groundwork for the social gerontology movement, describing the factors affecting the age structure of the population, the mortality experience in Puerto Rico, the impact of medical advances on longevity, and the role of policy in meeting future challenges. The article was based on life tables that Menéndez had worked on since 1968. He was acutely aware of the need for up-to-date statistical information on this issue. "There has been little systematic research on social gerontology for more than a generation. It grew from the excess knowledge in the 1960's, and became necessary to show people that they ought to put their own interests first," writes Menéndez, who found that those who are poorest in the industrialized world are often those most likely to suffer from their age-related afflictions. After he retired in 1972, Menéndez continued to work for the Bureau of

Gerontology at SSA, which had originally been part of the Bureau of
